Field of the Invention The present invention relates to connectors for use in connecting multi-chip modules to a printed circuit board. 2. Discussion of the

Related Art Multi-chip modules (MCM) are known in the art to increase the signal density of a printed circuit board. Several benefits are realized by providing MCMs. For example, fewer components are needed to achieve a given function and fewer connections must be made to a motherboard. In addition, the stacked modules themselves may be smaller than the modules that must be connected to them. A typical MCM includes a substrate having a first surface to which a plurality of chips are attached, and a second surface having a plurality of conductive traces. The substrate may comprise, for example, an epoxy resin having a plurality of plated-through holes in which the chips are mounted. In addition, the substrate may comprise ceramic, glass-filled epoxy or other suitable material that is not subject to delamination when subjected to the requisite thermal stress. MCMs are available in a wide variety of configurations. For example, one or more chips may be attached to a substrate in a generally horizontal direction, thereby forming a horizontal MCM, or in a vertical direction, thereby forming a vertical MCM. MCMs may be mounted directly on the motherboard or they may be mounted on a flexible connection board. The board flexes in the same plane as the MCM when the board is in the Z direction. In other words, if the board comprises an x-y plane, the flexing board will move in the x-y plane when the module is mechanically loaded in the Z direction. When the board is loaded in the Z direction, the contacts on the edges of the board that are adjacent to the module are disconnected and the contacts on the edges of the module that are adjacent to the board become disconnected. It is an object of the present invention to provide an improved connector for use with an MCM to overcome or at least mitigate one or more of the disadvantages of the prior art.хлеба в зависимости от вашей реак
